When standing or ambulating, a person's feet and ankles are the primary stabilizers. The hips contribute by transferring stability from the legs to the torso allowing an erect posture and good balance.

When an individual without any postural or balance deficits ambulates, the ankles are challenged and activated first followed by the hips. Often in the elderly, this order is reversed. If an elderly person has weak ankles or poor distal sensation, they are forced to compensate for these deficits by using their hips as their primary stabilizers. This causes inconsistencies in their base of support and is often the cause of an unsteady gait.
